20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	It is important that the LDF allows the reworking/reopening of small-scale quarries where these are needed to provide a source of materials for the maintenance of traditional buildings. This locally-sourced stone is essential to the conservation of the historic assets of the area.

20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	Minerals and waste development should continue to focus on small scale sites for meeting local needs. The Regional Planning Guidance for Yorkshire and the Humber requires a progressive reduction in the amount and proportion of aggregate extracted from the National Park. This should be taken forward through an appropriate policy in the LDF.

Respondent Number	14
Name	Sam Kipling
Organisation	Environment Agency
20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	The Agency welcomes the recycling schemes mentioned in this section. Comprehensive recycling facilities are an excellent way of reducing the pressure on landfill facilities. There is ongoing research into the impact of the use of biomass for energy generation on the environment. It is recommended that this is at least considered as an option in your area. It may also provide a solution to land filling problems.

20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	The focus for future minerals and waste development should continue to focus on providing for local needs. Large scale minerals and waste activity would almost certainly conflict with the statutory purposes of the Park designation. Small-scale minerals activity helps sustain good design of new development using local materials and is a sustainable source for the creation and repair of other landscape features such as stone walls.

20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	The Countryside Agency supports mineral extraction for local needs where it cannot be obtained from other sources in the locality and is appropriate to the setting. Extraction of minerals on a larger scale should only be considered where justification of significant national importance can be demonstrated, for example the National Park is the only location for that mineral. In such cases the scale and impact upon the landscape should be kept to a minimum and respect landscape character where possible. The Countryside Agency supports Government targets on recycling and reducing waste. Local recycling initiatives are to be encouraged, any associated infrastructure should take into account the setting and landscape character. The impact upon the environment resulting from the transportation of waste should also be taken into account in National Park policies.

20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	Minerals and waste development should continue to focus predominantly on local needs. Although the Regional Spatial Strategy and National Guidance set targets for the region in terms of waste and recycling, the National Park should seek to accommodate its own needs only rather than risking negative impacts on the Park which is a unique area of environmental importance. However, local needs (including business needs) should be met fully to ensure the Park is contributing on a local level to regional targets, and in the case of rural settlements, the ability for local people to recycle their waste must be provided for through the development of local, accessible recycling facilities.

20. Should minerals and waste development continue to focus on providing for local needs only?	Minerals extraction should be mainly for local use only. Recycling of waste should be further developed by use of biomass heating systems, composting schemes. A proportion of the council tax payments should be dependant upon the amount of waste each individual household produces. This would have the two fold effect of increasing re cycling - reducing waste and rewarding households who make an effort to reduce waste.
