

Ness Point

inspired by 'Ness Point' near Robin Hoods Bay

written by Toby Welford, age 7, Fylingdales C of E Primary School

A long time ago when even your granddad's and grandma's were children, the villagers of Robin Hood's Bay were the bravest adventurers of the earth. They used to go on all sorts of adventures across the universe.

One day all of the villagers awoke to the sound of "We're going on an adventurous parade!"

After they had packed their back packs they set off on their journey. After a while they came to a dead end so they all leaned over the cliff to see what was going on. But all that was down there was a stream gushing with water. But that wasn't all because suddenly there was a huge wind like a herd of elephants and it knocked them off the edge of the cliff and they fell down and down and down.

But just then .... there was a roar.

Out of the water came a huge monster with prickly spikes all down his back and his name was Fred Ness. He was a distant brother of Nessie from Loch Ness in Scotland and he had been hiding out near Robin Hood's Bay for centuries. The people screamed as they saw the spiny green monster with a neck as long as 12 football pitches. Before they could dive to the side they landed splat on his back.

They landed so hard that one of his spikes came off his back and stuck into the cliff. Unfortunately it cracked the whole of the cliff. Well nearly all of the cliff because the bit that the spike was in stayed in and it looked like a spike in the rock.

In the end the monster didn't eat them but took them back to land and from that day on that cliff was called Ness Point.
